MILK FEVER IN COWS

Outline of Treatment and Suggestions for Prevention

'VARIES FROM SEASON TO SEASON'

[By Veterinarian.]

There is no need to restate the fact that milk fever is a common trouble in our dairy herds. But few farmers do not meet with one or two cases each year, and some have about half their herds go down with it. It is interesting to note, however, that its incidence varies from season to season and also from farm to farm, which is suggestive that climatic conditions play no small part in its cause.

The actual cause of the semi-convulsive paralytic condition is due to a rapid fall in the level of the blood calcium (lime), but as yet no very conclusive evidence exists as to why this rapid fall should take place.

Let us summarize the known facts about this disease. (1) It is rarely seen in young cows, but is common in the third lactation season. (2) There is some evidence to show that it is more common in heavy lactations. (3) Cows which have the disease one year are apt to be free of it in the next, but not uncommonly a year or two later they are again liable to the disease. (4) There is some evidence to show that it is more common in heavy lactations. (5) Cows which have the disease one year are apt to be free of it in the next, but not uncommonly a year or two later they are again liable to the disease.

It occurs in the majority of cows within a few days after calving. Cows do so at other times in some circumstances, but it is not a general observation. It is not a general observation. It is not a general observation. It is not a general observation.

cause the parathyroids when this function is low being suggested as a temporary substitute of some form of this substance. This evidence is not conclusive, however, as it is well known that both the parathyroids and other secretions from ductless glands may affect the calcium metabolism of indirectly through the parathyroids. It is interesting to note that in all these points to suggest that a general disturbance of calcium metabolism may have a profound effect on the calcium metabolism of the body.

CAUSE OF FALL IN BLOOD CALCIUM

This phenomenon shows that when the amount of blood calcium level is only a very slight condition. It is estimated that the fall in blood calcium level is due to the rapid loss of calcium from the body.
